It is apparent that the original steps taken to pursue litigatin against Microsoft was politically motivated. Microsoft has enabled the ordinary individual to become computer competent. The various programs developed have been a boom to users and to the economy. Any punitive action would appear to smack of jealousy. Somehow the entire process has done nothing but collapse the computer industry. We hope that the case would be dropped, so the public can continue to receive the kind of service which Microsoft has been able to afford its customers, not to mention the many who have benefitted from its charitable donations.
